NO GROUND TROOPS

1 President Barack Obama ruled out a shift in strategy in the fight against the Islamic State despite the deadly attacks in Paris last week, saying putting U.S. troops on the ground to combat the group "would be a mistake." Obama, speaking after a G20 leaders' summit, said the U.S.-led coalition fighting Islamic State would redouble efforts to implement the current strategy. REUTERS

HATE CRIMES FALL

2 U.S. hate crimes fell 8 percent in 2014, with race by far the most common bias trigger, the FBI said. Police recorded 5,479 crimes motivated by bias last year, down from 5,928 in 2013, the FBI said in a breakdown of data from the Uniform Crime Reporting Program. The 5,462 incidents involving a single bias totaled 6,681 victims. Of the victims, 48.3 percent were targeted because of suspects' racial bias, followed by sexual orientation, at 18.7 percent, and 17.1 percent for religion, the Federal Bureau of Investigation said. Time running out for transgender bill

As Wednesday's legislative deadline nears, LGBTQ activists took to State House steps.

SPENCER BUELL

spencer.buell@metro.us

For activists seeking a transgender equal protections bill by year's end, the clock is ticking.

Lawmakers have until the end of this legislative session on Wednesday to get big ideas on the governor's desk – a queue that includes bills addressing the opioid crisis, solar energy, access to public records and privacy on social media. Groups are making last-minute efforts to get Beacon Hill's attention.

The time is now, demonstrators posted on the State House steps told Metro.

"This needs to get done by Wednesday because people are literally dying," said Kasey Suffredini, co-chair of Freedom for Massachusetts, the coalition at the center of advocacy for the bill. The proposal would give transgender individuals a legal shield against discrimination in public places: bathrooms, restaurants, parks.

"These are people, some of whom have lost their children to death by suicide because it is so difficult to be a transgender person in Massachusetts," he said of the two-dozen or so assembled at the State House.

About 41 percent of transgender people attempt suicide, a study from the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention found.

Advocates see the bill as a way to close the loop on a 2011 non-discrimination law, which had the public places provisions stripped out by lawmakers.

Opponents, among them the Family Law Institute and State Rep. James Lyons, point to uncomfortable consequences, chiefly that the bill would force people, including children, to share restrooms with transgender women born with male anatomy.

> "This needs to get done by Wednesday because people are literally dying."
> Suffredini

"I'm suggesting that the privacy rights of our children matter," Lyons said at a hearing in October. Gov. Charlie Baker has said he believes current law is sufficient to handle discrimination cases. Attorney General Maura Healey has disagreed, saying the state lacks legal grounds to protect the state's transgender population.

"Never in our state's history has a court extended protections under our public accommodations law to a transgender person," Healey wrote in a letter last week.

Seventeen states have passed laws similar to the protections sought by the bill's advocates.

The coalition had by Monday collected 5,500 signatures from supporters, which they planned to deliver to House Speaker Bob DeLeo and Senate President Stanley Rosenberg.

After a press conference, they clutched several piles of hundreds of sheets of paper, each of them representing a constituent who supports the bill, which they also planned to deliver to lawmakers. Among them was Carol Caravana, a mom whose son identifies as transgender.

"There are a lot of people in Massachusetts who want this and need it and it's just common-sense civil rights. We're not asking for anything unusual," Caravana said.

The activists had been joined by legislators, law enforcement officials and 14-year-old Brandon Adams, who testified at a hearing for the bill in October.

The coalition and other bill supporters face stiff competition. DeLeo, House speaker, has identified as his top priorities bills to lift a solar energy cap and revamp public records law in the state. Monday morning, Baker and Mayor Marty Walsh testified at a hearing on a bill targeting opioid abuse. On Wednesday, the Senate plans to take up a bill to criminalize fentanyl, a synthetic opiate used to cut heroin, the State House News Service reports.

Baker: No to Syrian refugees

Gov. Charlie Baker said Monday he was not willing to agree to accept Syrian refugees in Massachusetts until the federal government tells him "a lot more" about its plan for screening refugees who enter the country.

"No, I'm not interested in accepting refugees from Syria," Baker told reporters. "I would need to know a lot more than I know right now before I would agree to do anything."

In the wake of the deadly terrorist attacks in Paris on Friday, Baker's hardened position on accepting Syrian refugees follows similar pronouncements from other American governors about their reluctance to accept people seeking asylum from the war-torn Middle Eastern country.

ABC News reported Monday that governors in at least six other states — Alabama, Arkansas, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan and Texas — are refusing to accept refugees. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal signed an executive order to stop any relocation of refugees to his state.

Baker said he wants to get the full picture of the federal government's plan before saying yes or no definitively. So far, the governor said, he has had no conversations on the topic with federal officials.

"I think at this point in time, we would have to be very cautious about accepting folks without knowing a lot more about what the federal government's plan looks like and how it would actually be implemented and executed," Baker said.

Cops arrested a man who officers said they found passed out in the front seat of a car with a bottle of beer and a loaded Glock in Dorchester, Boston police said yesterday.

Police rolled into Lawrence Avenue in Dorchester at about 5:38 p.m. Saturday for a report of a person stabbed.

While there was no sign of anyone stabbed, police said they found a man slumped over, drooling in the passenger seat of a car. They say they saw a half-empty bottle of beer in his hand and couldn't wake him up when they knocked on the windows. When he didn't respond, police opened the doors.

As he came to, police spotted a loaded Glock 19 semi-automatic, officials said. The man did not have a license to carry, authorities said.

Officers arrested 37-year-old Brandon Howard from Boston on weapons charges. Police determined that the gun had been reported stolen, therefore, Howard was additionally charged with receiving stolen property. METRO

Police were called to Macy's on Washington Street on a report of a man trespassing and shoplifting — and he happened to be packing a pistol, officials said Monday.

Macy's loss prevention security team stopped a man and held him in their office at about 2:15 p.m. on Sunday. Personnel told police that they recovered a Smith & Wesson .38 Special on him along with two bags of a substance thought to be marijuana.

Dwayne Mincey, 40, from Dorchester, was charged with shoplifting and weapons possession. During the booking process, police found 16 more bags of a green leafy substance and a scale. Mincey was also charged with drug possession with intent to distribute. METRO

France: US, Russia must join forces

Vowing to destroy terrorism, France seeks global coalition against Islamic State.

French President Francois Hollande called on the U.S. and Russia to join a global coalition to destroy Islamic State in the wake of the attacks across Paris — and announced a wave of measures to combat terror in France.

"France is at war," Hollande told a joint session of parliament at the Palace of Versailles. He promised to increase funds for national security and strengthen anti-terror laws in response to the suicide bombings and shootings that killed 129.

Parliamentarians gave Hollande a standing ovation before spontaneously singing the "Marseillaise" national anthem in a show of political unity following the worst atrocity France has seen since World War II.

Islamic State has claimed responsibility for Friday's coordinated attacks, saying they were in retaliation for France's involvement in U.S.-backed air strikes in Iraq and Syria.

Hollande pledged that French fighter jets would intensify their assaults. He said he would meet U.S. President Barack Obama and Russian President Vladimir Putin in the coming days to urge them to pool their resources.

"We must combine our forces to achieve a result that is already too late in coming," Hollande said.

The U.S.-led coalition has been bombing Islamic State for more than a year. Russia joined the conflict in September, but Western officials say it has mainly hit foreign-backed fighters battling Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, not Islamic State.

"We're not engaged in a war of civilizations, because these assassins do not represent any. We are in a war against jihadist terrorism which is threatening the whole world."

Hollande told a packed, somber chamber

Speaking in Turkey at the same time as Hollande, Obama called Friday's attacks a "terrible and sickening setback," but maintained the U.S.-led coalition was making progress.

"Even as we grieve with our French friends ...we can't lose sight that there has been progress," Obama said at a Group of 20 summit, ruling out sending in ground troops.

Much of France came to a standstill at midday for a minute's silence to remember the dead, many of whom were young people killed as they enjoyed a night out. Metro trains stopped, pedestrians paused on pavements and office workers stood at their desks.

But in a sign of life slowly returning to normal, schools and museums reopened after a 48-hour shutdown, as did the Eiffel Tower, which lit up the night sky in the red, white and blue colors of the French flag following two days of darkness. REUTERS

Kerry arrives in Paris in show of U.S. support after attacks

Secretary of State John Kerry arrived in Paris on Monday to pay respects to those killed in last week's attacks in the French capital and to stress Washington's support for a key ally in the war against Islamic State militants.

Kerry's visit comes three days after gunmen killed more than 130 people in attacks on bars, a concert hall and a soccer stadium in Paris. Kerry is due to meet with President Francois Hollande on Tuesday morning.

The U.S. Secretary of State will express "shared resolve to continue countering violent extremism here and around the world," State Department spokesman John Kirby said.

President Barack Obama pledged support to France after the attacks, which he called "an outrageous attempt to terrorize innocent civilians". REUTERS

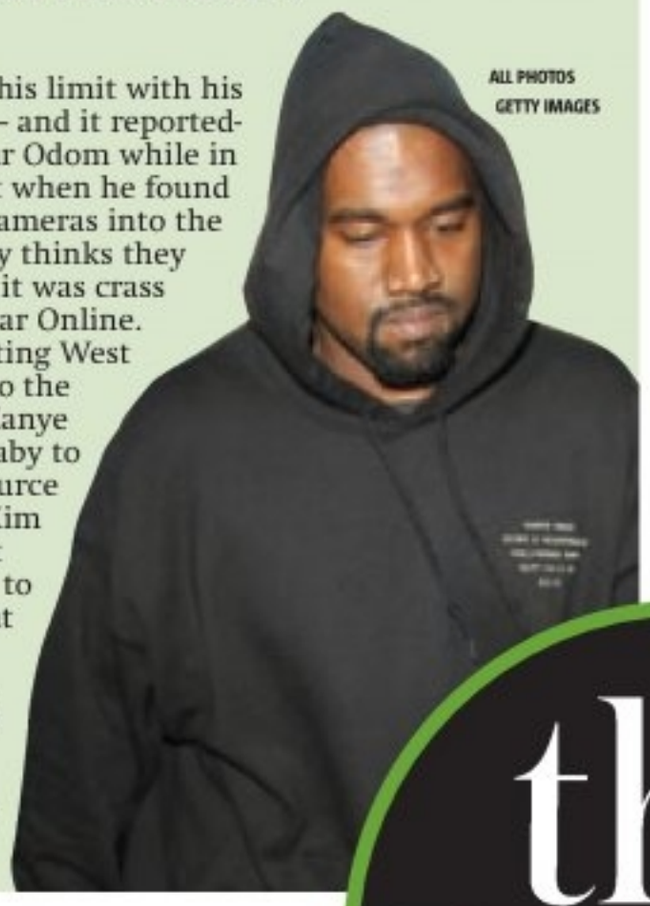
Kanye doesn't want to keep up with the Kardashians



ALL PHOTOS GETTY IMAGES

Kanye West may have finally hit his limit with his in-laws' reality TV shenanigans — and it reportedly came from a plan to film Lamar Odom while in the hospital. "Kanye was so upset when he found out the family wanted to sneak cameras into the hospital and film Lamar. He really thinks they hit a low with this stunt. He said it was crass of them to do," a source tells Radar Online. And that reaction may be prompting West to follow his gut when it comes to the Kardashians and his own kids. "Kanye doesn't want North or the new baby to be on the show anymore," the source explains. "He is really mad that Kim and Khloe and their mom exploit Lamar. He feels like Lamar needs to recover in privacy, and to put that on the show in his condition is just outrageous. Kanye is not going to let this go. He feels like he has to stand up to everyone for Lamar and for his daughter and son." Ironically, that would probably make pretty good TV.

Then Laila Ali chimed in, telling TMZ Sports, "In order to be the best in the world, you definitely don't ever get beat up like that in your prime, period." Ouch.

The singer will be back on the show next season. JON KOPALOFF

Her thought on Gwen and Blake: "Why not?"

NED EHRBAR
@Nedrick
ned.ehrbar@metro.us

You and millions of other Americans might be watching "The Voice" every week, but Christina Aguilera isn't. The singer and mom does not watch the show when she's serving as a coach or during the seasons she sits out, like this one.
But that doesn't mean she doesn't have an opinion on Gwen Stefani and Blake Shelton's new romance.

How do you think things are going this season on "The Voice"?
I don't watch my seasons or "The Voice," really, because I'd like to stay fresh and focused. (Laughs.) When I'm on it, I'm too tired to watch it back. And when I'm off of it, I'm with my kids and working on my music and making sure I'm refreshed and I'm not overwhelmed by it when I don't have to be on it. But I'm still with them. I've seen them every week since October pre-taping the battles. I was there for a coach performance yesterday, popping my head in. Some cool stuff going on over there. Got our first love connection, I guess. (Laughs.)

It was bound to happen at some point.
I know! Exciting stuff. I saw them both yesterday. I know their personal experiences with their divorces on separate levels, and man, I've been through a divorce myself, so everybody deserves happiness. And they're two amazing people, such hard workers. And Gwen also is a mother of three boys. I know she's a great mom, we've known each other for years going to each other's kids' birthdays and stuff. Happiness deserves happiness, you know? So, why not?

You've also teamed up with Verizon's Hopeline to raise awareness about domestic violence. Why is that issue important to you?
It hits home for me. I witnessed a lot of domestic violence growing up in my home, witnessed it in neighboring homes. So it's been something that's happened to me in life. It's part of my story, part of my history, partly what motivates me in many ways, to be honest. This is such a hush-hush topic. People don't really like to talk about it. They think it's none of their business. It happens in the privacy of the home, you know. And it's really, really hard sometimes, if you don't have the financial means, to leave a situation. It affects your children.

Speaking out

Of your work, which songs were the most inspired by your mother's struggle with domestic violence?
From my perspective, probably the song "I'm OK," that was on my "Stripped" record. And then later on from my "Back to Basics" record I did a song that was pretty much inspired by and dedicated to her called "Oh Mother."

My mom definitely was an example. She chose to empower herself and in turn empower her daughters by finally leaving a situation.

Do you think that's an area of inspiration you'll go back to, or have you covered that?
Yeah, I have. Unless I'm inspired or moved by it for a different reason, who knows? I never like to force anything. But I've done a lot of personal reflecting and healing and breathing into my body and my self. You know, my whole life whether it was witnessing domestic violence or working since I was 7 years old, it's always been sort of go, go, go, fight-or-flight mode. It's always been something. So it's so important for me, more so than ever now, to find outlets and ways for me to de-stress, for me to be gentle on myself and to encourage others to be gentle on themselves.

How do you find that mindset is influencing your music?
I don't like to be deadlined or pushed in a box or all of that stuff. (Laughs.) I kind of feel like I've worked my whole life in that way and I've done a great job at it; I've accomplished so much. And even though I haven't released an album [in three years], I'm still accomplishing things that inspire me by the moment. But yes, I am working on music. It's very exciting.

By the numbers

According to a Newsweek article, millennials comprise 40 percent of the unemployed in the U.S. And having a college degree is often not enough. A study by the Economic Policy Institute found that the unemployment rate among recent college graduates (ages 21-24) is 7.2 percent, compared with 5.5 percent in 2007. The underemployment rate is 14.9 percent, compared with 9.6 percent in 2007. Plus, 70 to 80 percent of graduating seniors are leaving college without a job.

How to turn your liberal arts degree into a job

The economy may look bleak for millennials, but there are plenty of companies looking to hire entry-level candidates.

RAQUEL LANERI
@RaquelLaneri
raquel.laneri@metro.us

Though the economy is in much better shape than it was at the end of 2008, it's still hard to get a job — particularly if you're young.

But there are still opportunities out there, says Bob LaBombard, CEO of GradStaff, which recruits college students for companies across the U.S. He says students just need to know how to access those opportunities.

"Every year we interview 4,000 to 5,000 candidates, and about 70 percent say they don't know where their education or skills fit in the workforce," he says.

In other words, they don't know what jobs to apply for — or even, for those with a more defined career goal, where to look for them.

So, how can students turn their bachelor's degree into a job? LaBombard gives us his tips.

Don't let your major define you

It can be hard figuring out what to do with a psychology degree, or even a chemistry one. Which is why LaBombard stresses focusing on your skills rather than your major. "When we're interviewing candidates, we ask them about things like critical thinking, time management, leadership, communication skills, emotional maturity," he says. "Don't just think about educational endeavors, but about all the activities you've participated in — sports or theater, writing for the college newspaper, doing volunteer work, your part-time jobs or summer jobs —and think about what people would compliment you on in those situations."

Network

It's never too early to start networking. Not only is it a good way to pinpoint potential careers that may interest you, but it can also land you a position. "Most entry-level jobs are not advertised," says LaBombard. "Especially given that so many of these jobs are created by small-to-medium employers, almost all of them are filled through referrals."

But networking doesn't have to be that hard, or icky. LaBombard suggests going through your college's list of alumni and reaching out to set up informational interviews "so you can learn about the real scoop on a particularly industry or career track." He also recommends reaching out to high school or college professors and even the parents of your friends to learn more about what they do.

"Most young people coming out of college have great networks," he says. "They just don't think about how to use that information appropriately."

Start early

Looking for a job can often be the last thing on a college senior's mind — what with exams, extracurriculars and enjoying your last few months with your friends. But LaBombard says it's important not to procrastinate. "You may have to sacrifice a few things here and there, but spending even just three hours a week on your job search during your senior year is really critical."

Students across US are mounting protests against student loan debt

They're also demanding free public college.

One more thing
The total volume of outstanding U.S. student loan debt has more than doubled to $1.2 trillion, according to the U.S. Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, compared to less than $600 billion in 2006.
A cry is being heard: no more student loan debt! ISTOCK

Students held demonstrations on university campuses across the U.S. last week to protest ballooning student loan debt and rally for tuition-free public colleges.

The demonstrations, dubbed the Million Student March, were planned just two days after thousands of fast-food workers took to the streets in a nationwide day of action pushing for a $15-an-hour minimum wage and union rights.

About 50 students from Boston-area colleges gathered at Northeastern University carrying signs that read "Is this a school or a corporation?" and "Degrees not receipts."

"The student debt crisis is awful. Change starts when people demand it in the street, not in the White House," says Elan Axelbank, 20, a third-year student at Northeastern.

Photos and videos posted on Twitter, where #MillionStudentMarch was trending worldwide, showed marches involving dozens to hundreds of demonstrators at schools including Texas State, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and DePaul University in Chicago.

A few hundred students rallied on the campus of the historically progressive University of California, Berkeley. They posted placards on the outside of a class building showing their individual student debt loads, ranging from several thousand dollars to more than $100,000.

Organizers are demanding tuition-free public colleges, cancellation of all student debt and a $15-an-hour minimum wage for campus workers.

Many college graduates struggle to make payments amid an ailing economy and job market.

Dealing with swiftly mounting student loan debt has been a focus of candidates vying for the White House in 2016.

Democratic hopeful Bernie Sanders tweeted in support of the movement on Thursday afternoon. He has vowed to make tuition free at public universities and colleges and has pledged to cut interest rates for student loans.

His Democratic rival, frontrunner Hillary Clinton, has said she would increase access to tuition grants, let graduates refinance loans at lower interest rates and streamline income-based repayment plans.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, the most prominent Republican candidate to lay out a concrete proposal, says he would establish an income-based repayment system for federal student loans and would simplify applications for federal aid.

Student demonstrators also widened their message to echo protests at the University of Missouri, three days after the school's president resigned amid student anger over failure to address racial discrimination on campus. REUTERS

The gift of digital detox

The holidays are the perfect time to check into the real world.

ELODIE NOËL
Metro World News
letters@metro.us

"A smartphone owner picks up their phone more than 1,500 times a week."

Gauthier Peyrouzett, Digital Detox Holidays

Going on vacation used to mean switching off life's usual responsibilities. But thanks to having email right on our phones and feeling the need to share our most picturesque, or noteworthy, moments on Facebook, Instagram and Twitter, even the holiday season doesn't offer a respite from the pressure of being always connected.

This constant #FOMO, or "fear of missing out," makes it hard to take a break from the stress of our daily lives. And it has gotten so bad that it's spawning cottage industries dedicated to helping us shut off.

"Many people suffer from being hyper-connected during the year and their holidays," says Gauthier Peyrouzet, founder of Digital Detox Holidays, which maintains a database of hotels offering programs that help visitors unplug. "There is a real demand from people to get the opportunity to disconnect from the continuous flow of information that they receive on their phones, tablets and computers."

Whether we use them for work or pleasure — or, increasingly, both, as our social media identities become part of our résumé — there's definitely an addiction component to our relationship with our devices. But using them more isn't making us better at anything but feeling less connected, according to neuroscientist Earl K. Miller at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

"The problem is that our brains are ill-equipped to deal with so much information," he says. "We are remarkably single-minded and terrible at multitasking, but we want to do it, because our brains find information rewarding."

Being able to get in touch with anyone and share information at all times has its benefits. But we tend to prioritize that ability at the expense of our health.

"A smartphone owner picks up their phone more than 1,500 times a week. The relationship with the world is made through an object, which is reassuring but also creates a bubble, preventing you from seeing what's out there," explains Peyrouzet.

There's nothing we should be doing 1,500 times a week except breathing. So take the holiday season as your chance to break the cycle.

Physical distance

A lot of offices run software or encryption programs that make working remotely either cumbersome or impossible, so being physically away from the office is a great chance to say, "There's nothing I can do about it." That includes not checking emails you can't deal with — especially ones that require input from someone else on your team. Set your out-of-office message and actually be out of the office, instead of making to-do lists and preparing to be back in it.

Clear priorities

The problem with the routine of daily life is that your priorities are set. Most of our days start and end in bed, holding our phones. "The consequence is that there is no real off time," Miller says. "Being well-connected means people expect more from us. That's a lot of pressure."

When you're forced out of that comfort zone by traveling during the holidays or just seeing the mental shift that comes with remembering what's important this time of year, it can put things in an unexpected perspective. Instead of trying to fit the holiday and your loved ones into your usual routine, let them set the schedule. You're sure to experience something new, and you won't be able to justify taking out your phone "just to check Yelp reviews," a move that turns into 20 minutes of browsing Twitter.

Experiences worth sharing

If a single photo is enough to tell a whole story, it might be because you were too busy taking the picture instead of experiencing the moment to give it context and meaning. Having everyone, whether it's friends or family, in the same place at the same time is an opportunity to deepen relationships, discuss the past or your hopes for the future. That's the stuff that doesn't fit in a single Instagram post.

Stay at a hotel

If you need a little help, as Peyrouzet puts it, to "rediscover the pleasure of disconnecting from everything," check into a hotel with a special digital detox program. Whether it's an on-site spa, a class that teaches better tech habits or being rewarded for turning over your phone for a brief period, there are clever ways to keep you in the moment if you just can't be trusted to manage your digital domain.

Replacing Mr. Irreplaceable

The Patriots' offense will have a whole different look moving forward without Julian Edelman.

MATT BURKE
@burke_metro
matthew.burke@metro.us

Tom Brady is right. The Patriots aren't going to flat-out "replace" Julian Edelman this season, unless Edelman himself makes a quicker-than-expected recovery from a severe left foot injury.

Still, the Bill Belichick-era Pats are arguably the best team in the history of North American professional sports at adapting and morphing on the fly. Their offense post-Edelman injury against the Giants looked nothing like the five-wide stuff they were running earlier in the game and they ultimately won the game despite the loss of No. 11.

Here are some routes of adaptation the Pats could use going forward:

In-house solution

Keshawn Martin will have the unfortunate duty of "replacing" Edelman on the sheet of paper that reads "depth chart" and he'll likely get to say his name and college of origin on "Sunday Night Football" against the Broncos in 12 days. This does not mean that he'll become anything close to a focal point in the Pats' offense, but — at the same time — it'll be more likely to see the fourth-year man out of Michigan State in the mix than a Matthew Slater-type. Martin has been targeted seven times by Brady this season but has dealt with his own injury issues (hamstring), limiting his production. The 25-year-old played his first three NFL seasons with Houston, catching 38 balls and pulling in three touchdowns.

Julian Edelman had emerged as the top slot receiver in football before his foot injury. GETTY IMAGES

Rely on the tight end

Scott Chandler should be seeing plenty of targets in the next few weeks. Brady doesn't seem totally comfortable with him yet, but one would guess Brady would rather look Chandler's way than, say, Aaron Dobson's way. Chandler's season high for targets came in Week 2 against Buffalo as Brady looked his way five times. Chandler scored a touchdown in the Giants game on Sunday, but it was his only reception (he was targeted three times in East Rutherford). Obviously, Rob Gronkowski is option No. 1 at this position but defenders are going to blanket Gronk more than ever while Edelman is out.

Man on the street

"Let's go get Wes Welker!" was the cry from many a Patriots fan when Edelman went down Sunday … that is until they remembered that St. Louis had signed him the week prior. It's unlikely that the Rams would waive Welker at some point this season as he inked a one-year deal with up to $700,000 in incentives (playing time, amount of catches). The former Pats star caught three passes for 32 yards in his Rams debut Sunday and with St. Louis still very much in the mix for a playoff spot, it'll likely hold onto him. Hakeem Nicks, Reggie Wayne and Terrelle Pryor are big names that are out there, but are unlikely to sign with the Patriots due to various circumstances.

NBA power rankings | by James Toscano

No. 1

Warriors (11-0)

Everybody wants to talk about the Patriots possibly going undefeated. The Warriors are almost 1/7 of the way there and showing no signs of slowing down. Seriously, they're awesome. Not much else to say.

No. 2

Cavaliers (8-2)

Cleveland had its eight-game winning streak snapped in double OT by the Milwaukee Bucks, but an 8-2 record to start the year without Kyrie Irving and Iman Shumpert is pretty darn impressive.

No. 3

Spurs (7-2)

If not for the Warriors, many NBA pundits would be locked into the Spurs right now. They've been in cruise control since a buzzer-beating loss to the Wizards almost two weeks ago.

No. 4

Clippers (6-4)

Doc Rivers has plenty of small forward options, but in the team's recent win over the Pistons, Lance Stephenson wasn't one of them. He played less than two minutes. Something tells me he won't be a "pro's pro" about it if it happens regularly.

No. 5

Thunder (6-4)

It was a shame that Kevin Durant injured his hamstring in D.C., but it looks like it's not too serious and he should be back in a couple games. The Thunder couldn't get past the Celtics without him, though.

No. 6

Hawks (8-4)

Two losses in a row at the hands of the Celtics and the Jazz. Atlanta had a chance to beat Utah, but Paul Millsap's jumper missed the mark. That said, Jeff Teague injured his ankle vs. the Celtics and missed the game against Utah.

No. 7

Raptors (7-4)

The Raptors may have just blown a late fourth-quarter lead to lose to the Kings, but it's not all bad news as the Raptors and Drake have collaborated on a new Raptors clothing line. Just $64.99 for a T-shirt!

No. 8

Heat (6-3)

News resurfaced recently that the Heat intend on making a pitch to Kevin Durant once the star hits free agency. I just don't see Durant and Miami as a match. Plus, Dwyane Wade isn't going to take another big discount to make it work, is he?

No. 9

Rockets (4-6)

We have found our streaky NBA team. Three losses, four wins, three losses. It appears the loss at home to the Nets really sent this team back into a tailspin — and who can blame them?

No. 10

Wizards (4-4)

The cool story out of D.C. is that Kris Humphries has become a three-point shooter. After an entire career inside the three-point line, Hump is now averaging 3.5 attempts a game. He hit five of them against the Magic.

No. 15

Celtics (5-4)

Big wins over the Wizards, Hawks and Thunder and it seems as if guys are beginning to slide into their roles. Give it up for Jared Sullinger, who has turned things around fast.

Aries Your helpful attitude is commendable, but don't let anyone take advantage of you. Take care of your responsibilities instead someone else's.

Taurus Work hard, play hard and enjoy life. Don't let a friend, loved one or peer hinder your progress or bring down your quality of life.

Gemini Be honest and charming when dealing with others. Back away from anyone who appears to harbor ulterior motives or is a bad influence.

Cancer You'll have a way with words today. You will be able to convince others to see things your way. An interesting concept will grab your attention.

Leo You'll crave change today. Don't feel bad if others fail to share your free-spirited approach to life. Say little in order to avoid controversy.

Virgo If you embrace a challenge, you will show everyone how competitive you can be. Do things in your own unique, practical manner.

Libra Put your plans in motion. Stop thinking and start taking action. Don't hesitate because of what someone else is doing or saying. Show off your skills.

Scorpio Open-mindedness will help resolve any emotional issues that arise. Your keen perception will ensure that you say and do the right thing.

Sagittarius Do whatever it takes to strengthen your position. Don't fold under pressure. If someone is being demanding, offer what you can.

Capricorn Don't let love or emotional matters stop you from making the decision that is best for you. A financial move will stabilize your position.

Aquarius Don't be confused by what others do or say. Make a point to do the things that make you happy rather than trying to please someone.

Pisces Don't lose sight of your financial goals, give in to temptation or listen to a friend who tries to entangle you in a dubious scheme. EUGENIA LAST
